At the time Park Avenue was lined with the massive mansions of Minnesota's first families, and the residents at 2615 enjoyed the prestige of the Park Avenue location. Apartment hotels were already a popular residential arrangement, but few could compete with 2615 Park for style and service. Over the course of time, many such apartment-hotels have been torn down or converted to other uses. But 2615 remains a thriving enterprise, now as a co-operative. Building on a Borrowed Past: Place and Identity in Pipestone, Minnesota	Paperback	Southwick, Sally J.	2005	Founded in 1874, Pipestone, MN, "Home of the Red Stone Pipe," was named for the quarries where regional Indian tribes excavated the revered soft stone for making ceremonial pipes. Lewis and Clark noted the quarry in their journals, and explorer and cartographer Joseph Nicollet described "a spectacle full of grandeur." George Catlin sketched and painted the quarries, and Henry Wadsworth Longfellow used legends from the quarries in his well-known poem, The Song of Hiawatha. Attracted by Catlin's and Longfellow's popular images, a community of white settlers from the Midwest and New England promoted the quarries as both safe and exotic, central to America's Indian heritage as a unique mystical site. Pipestone residents' promotional efforts helped the town obtain a federal Indian Boarding School in the 1890s and a national monument in the 1930s, and a pageant based on The Song of Hiawatha has played at a lake near the pipestone quarries for almost sixty years. A highly original study that is of particular importance as communities across the United States and elsewhere explore heritage tourism as a way to boost local economies, Sally J. Southwick's prizewinning book demonstrates how small-town citizens and boosters contributed to the generic image of "the Indian" in American culture and describes the process of one culture absorbing the heritage of another for civic advantage. The history of a community like Pipestone reveals that the formation of local and national American identity is an ongoing process of negotiating the meanings of cultural, spiritual, and racial symbols and constructing unique new forms of local and national heritage.

Emancipation's Diaspora: Race and Reconstruction in the Upper Midwest	Paperback	Schwalm, Leslie A.	2009	Most studies of emancipation's consequences have focused on the South. Moving the discussion to the North, Leslie Schwalm enriches our understanding of the national impact of the transition from slavery to freedom. "Emancipation's Diaspora" follows the lives and experiences of thousands of men and women who liberated themselves from slavery, made their way to overwhelmingly white communities in Iowa, Minnesota, and Wisconsin, and worked to live in dignity as free women and men and as citizens. Schwalm explores the hotly contested politics of black enfranchisement as well as collisions over segregation, civil rights, and the more informal politics of race -- including how slavery and emancipation would be remembered and commemorated. She examines how gender shaped the politics of race and how gender relations were contested and negotiated within the black community. Based on extensive archival research, "Emancipation's Diaspora" shows how in churches and schools, in voting booths and Masonic temples, in bustling cities and rural crossroads, black and white midwesterners - women and men - shaped the local and national consequences of emancipation.

She demonstrates the historical, theoretical, and cultural links between two groups that are rarely thought of together and in so doing illuminates our understanding of the meaning of home and citizenship for migrants and immigrants in the post-World War II period. Buff shows the importance of lively and colorful festivals not just as forms of performance or entertainment, but also as crucial sites for making and remaking meanings about group history and survival. While cultural performances for both groups contain a history of resistance to colonial oppression, they also change and creatively respond to the experience of migration and the forces of the global mass culture industry.

Storefront Revolution: Food Co-ops and the Counterculture	Paperback	Cox, Craig	1994	In the 1960s, the cooperative networks of food stores, restaurants, bakeries, bookstores, and housing alternatives were part counterculture, part social experiment, part economic utopia, and part revolutionary political statement. The co-ops gave activists a place where they could both express themselves and accomplish at least some small-scale changes. By the mid-1970s, dozens of food co-ops and other consumer- and worker-owned enterprises were operating throughout the Twin Cities, and an alternative economic network--with a Peoples' Warehouse at its hub--was beginning to transform the economic landscape of the metropolitan Minneapolis-St. Paul area. However, these co-op activists could not always agree among themselves on their goals. Craig Cox, a journalist who was active in the co-op movement, here provides the first book to look at food co-ops during the 1960s and 1970s. He presents a dramatic story of hope and conflict within the Minneapolis network, one of the largest co-op structures in the country. His "view from the front" of the Co-op War" that ensued between those who wanted personal liberation through the movement and those who wanted a working-class revolution challenges us to re-think possibilities for social and political change. Cox provides not a cynical portrait of sixties idealism, but a moving insight into an era when anything seemed possible.
